

One Man Up and Down But Mostly Down: A Hilarious and Heartwarming Search for the Greatest Invention That Never Was

A laugh-out-loud funny, poignant, and ultimately inspiring memoir of one man's quest to find the greatest invention that never was.

When David Ewing Duncan was a child, he was fascinated by the stories his grandfather told him about the inventions he had made. Duncan's grandfather was a brilliant engineer who had worked on everything from the atomic bomb to the space shuttle. But his most ambitious project was a device he called the "Universal Translator." This device would allow people to communicate with each other in any language, no matter how different.
